Speech Recognition -Voice Control -Conversation Partner -Plug-in Control -Open Folder Command -Type Text Command -More Commands 1. Baidu Cloud Translate is a cloud based Chinese-English translation service. It's probably the best you will get and it's even free. All you need to do is download the client and start using. 2. Sogou Cloud Translate is another service that works very well and is not quite as heavy as Baidu's. It also works with both Chinese and English, so that should suffice if one of them is your native language. 3. If the site I just linked you to was too big for you, I would recommend you use Microsoft Translator. Here's how to use it: 4. Bing's website offers great resources for finding translators on the Web. 5. I use Google translate myself to give a quick translation on a site, but it's quite limited. Baidu and Sogou offer many more choices and are more accurate. 6. Want to translate your site? They have an easy to use translator. 7. Another option is Babelfish. I found it very useful when I was living in the Philippines. It's free but you'll need to find a source for voice. I found this one to be acceptable: 8. If all else fails, Google might help you out. 9. If you really have to translate something, you can always use the Services.org translators. In the Windows context, "Clipboard" is usually synonymous with "Selection". This is a bad definition, because the clipboard in the Windows context is a very different concept from a clipboard on the Mac. Mac Clipboards The Mac clipboard is the place where information is copied and pasted from one application to another. On the Mac, you can copy and paste information from multiple applications and even, if you're feeling fancy, copy a bunch of data and paste it into multiple applications with a single Command-C/Command-V sequence. In the Windows context, the clipboard is synonymous with the selection. Like the Mac's clipboard, the Windows selection is a representation of the data that is selected. But unlike the Mac's clipboard, it's only one piece of data. Mac Clipboards When you copy something in Mac OS X, it gets copied to the clipboard. There are no guarantees, though.

Responding Partner Cracked Version is a personal desktop assistant that can be executed by you with your voice. Aside from that, it provides a conversation partner that you can talk to anytime. Once installed, the application displays a fun animated character onto the desktop, in the form of a radio microphone. Alis, because that is its name, starts giving you instructions on how to use the program. The 'Options' window is the place where you can manage voice commands and controls. Responding Partner Cracked Accounts comes with a predefined set of commands that allow you to communicate with your new virtual friend. Each voice command has a corresponding answer that is spoken out loud by Alis. Unfortunately, existing commands cannot be edited. Nevertheless, the application enables you to add new commands to the list that are immediately recognized by Alis. You can use Responding Partner to perform basic tasks, such as opening a file, running a program or launching a URL using the default web browser, shutting down or restarting the computer and logging off the current user. In addition to this, Alis can play the role of a personal assistant that types in text in a word processing application. Also, the application can be assigned functions for closing a running program or reading words out loud. Its functionality can be enhanced further by using the 'Plugin' section. As expected, the accuracy of the application highly depends on your pronunciation skills. Native English speakers shouldn't have problems in this matter, but foreigners might have to repeat the same command twice or more. Responding Partner acts as a desktop assistant that executes commands you speak out loud. It is fun to have around, enabling you to use your voice to perform specific actions, thus easing your work and improving your performance. Alis, the application's user interface (UI), comes in the form of a cute little icon that sits on your desktop. The UI displays the application's main window and some additional buttons on the right side of the window. Inside the main window you can choose which of the application's predefined commands you want to execute. To do so, drag the command you want to work with from the predefined list to the 'Command' box. Once your choice is made, the application automatically recognizes the command you just typed and speaks the answer out loud. For example, by typing "shut down," the application would tell you, "this computer will be shut down in one minute." While it is great to have a voice that can execute commands, you also have to be able to speak out loud. To allow the application to understand you, the 'Options' window is opened where you can give instructions to your application, such as "get some milk," "connect to the internet," "turn off the computer", etc. Alis can perform multiple functions. It can, for example, launch the default web browser, read a word out loud and write it down in a word processing application, close running programs or shut down your computer. It can also read all of the text in an Internet Explorer window and close it. Using the 'Plugin' section, you can add new commands that are immediately recognized by Alis. The 'Plugins' directory of the application contains a number of command plugins. Since Alis is a virtual application, its speech recognition has a limited vocabulary. Nonetheless, existing commands can be edited to add a new one. Responding Partner isn't the only program that uses speech recognition to control the computer. For instance, Dragon NaturallySpeaking 11, a well-known speech recognition application, can be used to perform the same functions. You can use Responding Partner to launch a web browser, open a file, execute a command, etc. However, unlike Dragon NaturallySpeaking 11, the application doesn't work with most web browser. In addition to its commands, Alis can be used as a personal assistant that can type text into a word processing application. The application comes with a default set of commands that have been created by its developer. The accuracy of the application heavily depends on your pronunciation skills. Native English speakers shouldn't have problems in this matter, but foreigners might have to repeat the same command twice or more. Best Features: The application works by recording
