Kamala Harris (D-CA) touted her democratic socialist "Medicare for All" plan at a campaign event in Iowa this week as well as in her closing remarks at the Democratic debate on Wednesday. But at the debate, it was not for a moment a topic mentioned by Joe Biden, Warren, or Sanders, the top three contenders for the nomination. Harris's remarks at the debate illustrated that she has an entirely different policy agenda than Sanders and Warren, who have campaigned in recent days on Medicare for All proposals. "We must stand up to the insurance industry, to the drug companies, and to the fossil fuel industry and their attacks on our health care," said

Harris, before saying the following:

Advertisement: "I would make public the Medicare for All plan that I helped to create. It covers all Americans with a plan that no one can afford to say no to. I think it will be very compelling for America, and I think it will win and I'm really glad we are having this conversation. I've got Medicare for All, it's called Medicare for America." "Medicare for All," of course, is the term used to describe the Sanders and Warren's health care proposals. Medicare for All means that every American would get government-run health insurance. According to the two candidates, it would also eliminate private health insurance companies time authors of america publication date. Genetic or psychosocial factors among parents may contribute to social-emotional problems in children with mental retardation. To examine the independent and combined effects of parenting behaviors and attachment style, and genetic vulnerability on social-emotional problems in preschool children with mental retardation. Three hundred three children with mental retardation and their parents were recruited from 30 institutions in the Netherlands. They were screened with the Youth Self-Report and the Behavior Assessment System for Children. Sixty-four parent-child dyads with the same diagnosis and at similar intellectual level participated in this study. Caregivers' psychopathological behaviors, attachment style, and genetic vulnerability were assessed by the Child Behavior Checklist, the Adult Attachment Interview, and the Child Behavior Checklist-Attachment Behavior Code, respectively. Parents with no psychopathological behavior (Md = 3.0) and those who reported low levels of attachment anxiety (Md = 5.0) were more likely to display a positive development in attachment behavior compared to those with higher levels of attachment anxiety (Md = 7.0). Children with parents showing a positive development in attachment behavior and with an avoidant attachment style had higher levels of social-emotional problems (Md = 4.4) compared to children whose parents reported a negative development in attachment behavior (Md = 3.3) and who were secure (Md = 3.2).

Caregiver's affect expression and genetic vulnerability were found to be associated with social-emotional problems only among children from single-parent families. The emotional and behavior problems of
